SPACE TRAVEL — IS IT POSSIBLE?

Whether or not space travel is possible depends on what you consider space travel to be. Actually, some animals have been into space. These were sent up to an altitude of ninety miles, where over ninety-five per cent of the atmosphere was below them. To the scientist, this is space travel; but to the layman wishing to be able to spend a week's vacation on Saturn, it is problematical whether or not his dream will ever come true. Travel within our own solar system may be possible, but travel beyond the confines of this solar system is even more doubtful.

There are several reasons which support the fact that we may never be able to go out of our own solar system. The first, and most important reason, is the vast distance involved when one is referring to space. According to Einstein's theory of relativity, the diameter of the universe is two billion light years. Assuming that we could attain the speed of light (186,000 miles per second), and according to Einstein, that no greater speed is possible, this would mean that, in order to cross the universe, we would have to travel for two billion years! Therefore, it is fairly safe to assume that man will never cross the entire universe.

The above length of time for the crossing of the universe is based on some mode of transportation which could travel at the speed of light. However, man has made very puny progress toward this goal. In the fifty years since man's first flight, his greatest achievement in aeronautics was the Bell X-2, which flew in excess of two thousand miles per hour. However, this is a long way from 186,000 miles per second.

Besides distance, there are a great many other factors involved in space travel within our own solar system. Astrophysicists tell us that there are certain planets on which life, as we know it, cannot exist. Two of these are Mercury and Jupiter. On Mercury, the temperature often reaches one thousand degrees Centigrade; whereas, Jupiter is made up entirely of liquified ammonia gas. Therefore, travel to these two planets is impossible. A trip to Mars might be accomplished if one could withstand the dangers of meteorites, cosmic radiation, lack of atmosphere, gravitational differences between the other planets and Earth, and the extreme cold (—456 degrees Fahrenheit).

These were some of the reasons which prompted Doctor Werner von Braun, America's leading expert on rockets and space travel, to say, "I believe that space travel will remain like an expedition to the Antarctic—a challenge to the brave hardy few."

LITERATURE

RUNAWAY GIRL

At the age of sixteen I felt I had the world by the seat of the pants on a down hill grade. I got up that morning with a chip on my shoulder, defying anyone to knock it off, and very valiantly struck out.

My destination would be California, as I had some relations out there, and my parents would never think of my going that far.

I had on me twenty-five dollars which I had earned baby-sitting and doing odd jobs. I had started saving as soon as I decided that living in the country was not the life for me.

I had decided to take half of the money and take a bus to New York, for I was certain I could get a job in a city that big. I would use the rest of my money for a room while I was looking for a job.

I arrived in New York at seven o'clock. I got off the bus and inquired around for a good place to stay. I walked and walked until I thought I was going to drop. I would have been thankful for just a little corner to sleep in.

Suddenly, I came upon a little restaurant that was open. I went in and ordered a cup of coffee. I inquired about a place to stay and a job. Evidently the man that waited on me was the owner. He said he needed a girl and gave me the address of a place where I could find a room. I was to report there early the next morning.

I got up the next morning with the same chip on my shoulder, but it had become smaller. I arrived at the restaurant at seven o'clock to find that I was the new dishwasher. At ten o'clock I was up to my elbows in dishes. This would bring me enough money to go to Phoenix.

I changed my name, had my hair cut and fixed differently. I did not want to spend too much time here, as somebody would soon be looking for me. I had six dollars left from the money I had started with and fifteen dollars for my week's work. I got on the train for Phoenix on Sunday morning. I had just got settled when an old man with a cigar sat down in the seat beside me. He smoked that cigar all the way to Phoenix. I got so choked up with smoke I thought I was going to faint several times. He talked just as much as he puffed on that cigar. I got off the train a total wreck. If only I could have one of my mother's hot meals and an evening watching television. If I could only wake up in my own room the next morning and find this a bad dream. I was going to be a senior this fall. Now the class would graduate without me. I felt just like crying.

I found a room, and the next morning I started to hunt for a job. I hunted all day, but I couldn't find any. The next day I found one doing waitress work. I got fired as I had not had enough experience. The next day back into the dishpan I went.

I spent two weeks working there. I had been gone almost a month, and no one had found me or sent me home. I had wished many times that they had.

I had enough money now to go to my aunt's in California. I took the train and arrived there at eight o'clock the following Sunday. I rang the bell and waited for someone to open the door. When it did open, I was one of the happiest girls that have ever walked.

One of my girl friends had told mamma and daddy about my saying I was going to my aunt's in California. Daddy had sent mamma to California to bring me back when I arrived, and she was the one who opened the door.

THE RING

Danny was visiting his grandmother in Ellsworth, but he was lonely, for he had no one to play with. Every day or so he'd ask his grandmother to tell him about the little boy whose picture was hanging over the fireplace.

One afternoon Danny's grandmother called him to her side and said, "David was my little grandson, too. If he were with us now, he would be sixteen years old. It all happened ten years ago when David was visiting me for the summer. His father had died when he was just a baby, and his mother loved David dearly. He had a dog named Rover. He and Rover had much fun playing together."

One day David said to Rover, "Today we're going to play 'Indians,' but you're going to be the prisoner." He shut the dog in the shed and ran around the barn toward the woods. I ran to the door to tell him to come back, but he never heard me, for he had already disappeared.

After he had been gone half an hour, I got worried and called the neighbors to help me look for him. We searched and searched the woods, but we never did find him.

There had been a band of gypsies roaming about at that time, and we thought they must have carried him away; however, his mother kept saying he was dead. She died within a few long months with a broken heart.

Every night Danny dreamed of David. They would play and talk together, but each morning he could never remember what they had played or what they had said.

One night after he had gone to sleep, he was awakened by a movement in his room. He looked up to see a little boy looking down at him. The little boy took Danny by the hand and led him downstairs out to the barn. They climbed a set of rickety stairs which led to an attic filled with old dusty boxes and furniture. At the far end of the attic was a trunk that was free of any dust. The little boy touched the trunk and it flew open. He beckoned for Danny to come closer and see the toys he had in the trunk.

Then the little boy took a ring from his finger and handed it to Danny. As Danny reached for the ring, the boy dropped it; and it fell into the trunk. The boy disappeared.

When Danny awoke the next morning, he told his grandmother all about what had happened. She asked him what the ring looked like, and all he could remember was that it had a picture of a little boy on it, something like the picture hanging over the fireplace.

Danny's grandmother was horrified. She knew that David's mother had given him the ring which had belonged to his father, and she knew, too, that Danny must have had a true vision of David and the ring. Then she remembered the trunk! That was where David was going to hide if the Indians ever came!

"Oh!" she thought, "Why didn't I remember what David had told me that day so long ago?"

When they investigated they found things as Danny had said they were, except the old trunk. It was covered with dust, too. They opened the trunk to find the heartbreaking remains of poor little David. And there, too, was the ring on his fleshless finger.

WHAT I CAN SEE FROM MY WINDOW

As I awaken each morning, from my window I see a field. It is just an ordinary field, about a half acre in size, plowed under and anxious for a winter's rest. The soil is black and rich in contrast with the surrounding forest edges of fall-colored leaves, deep-green cedar, and wisps of brown long-haired grass. On two of its sides lie an aged stone wall, now nearly covered with new vegetation. In this field I see many things.

First, I see Nature at work in and by this little site upon Earth's surface. The richness of the soil discloses organic substances of matter that once had life. The soil also tells of chemicals and compounds mixed by Mother Nature herself in this great laboratory, our Earth. With knowledge new bushes and small, dainty trees tell the time-old mystery of the seed. The small gurgling brook in the left hand corner of the field utters in friendly tones to its clinging banks and pebbled bed. In a straight angle with my window stands an apple tree, laden with blushing, smiling crab apples. This field praises the sky for the gentle caress of falling rain. When wind passes swiftly overhead, it strains to drink in the stories of strange lands over which this wind has traveled. In winter this small field cuddles closely to the blanket of snow which Mother Nature bestows upon it. In spring it dances and laughs, as its rich soil mixes with melted snow to tell the world that it has awakened from slumber. In summer it becomes mother of a crop—verdant, alive, fruitful. When fall returns, it thankfully prepares again for its long night of repose.

Secondly, I see evidence of Man. In the upper right hand corner is a pile of cedar, waiting to be carried away for man's use. The furrowed ground shows that, at one time or another, man came and exposed the hidden rich soil to the elements and to the beauty of the outside world. The stone walls on the northern and western sides show evidence that man's hands once cleared this land for his purpose. In these sights I do see man, having toiled and labored and having spent his time in this field to provide for his needs. Here, too, is evidence that this field has been fruitful and rewarding to his labors.

Last and most important of all, I see Beauty—beauty in Nature's wonders, beauty in its yield to man, beauty in merely its existence. This is what I can see from my window. How I wonder if all who have looked from this window have stopped long enough to see this little field as I see it!

WHAT MAKES A HOUSE A HOME?

A house is nothing but a building, no matter whether it's a twenty-room mansion or a one-room shack.

You can live in a house with wall to wall carpeting or a bare plank floor; the house can have knotty pine paneling or plaster, which, to coin a phrase, is "more holy than righteous"; the roof may leak, and the heat may come from an old wood stove made from a barrel or from a large fully automatic oil furnace in the cellar; yet it is still a building, not a home.

A house can shelter a dozen people or only a single person and still be only a house.

A house is only as much of a home as the people living there make it. It can be a place for only eating, sleeping, and getting a change of clothing, or it can be a place of warmth and happiness, with memories of many happy moments for its occupants.

To be a home, a house must hold something besides the latest in physical comforts and luxuries. It must hold the most important thing in the world—love, love that one remembers when he is far from home, love that will keep him warm-hearted and glad just to be alive.

My recipe for making a house a home is as follows:

Take one home and add a happy, kindhearted person. Season well with memories and mix well. Garnish with love and understanding and allow to mellow in the casks of time. Serve often.

This is what makes a house a home—the love and understanding of its occupants.

UNSUNG HEROES

It is a dreary day for the underworld when crime-fighting units are formed. Composed of four or five stout-hearted young men, these groups are organized to wipe out crime in all its haunts. Only chance had thrown these persons together in this common fight for justice; but before these groups are finished, all the murderers and robbers in that vicinity will pay their crimes with jail sentences.

Hundreds of similar units are formed daily by creative persons resembling each other in mind, body, and age. Though not versed in the orthodox method of crime detection, they work unceasingly as if they were veteran G-men.

These unsung heroes solve hundreds of cases of crime per day, with little or no support or encouragement from their superiors. Discouragement is at every turn of the road for fear that someone will get hurt. Limits and restricted areas that can and cannot be covered are set by their superiors.

The sacrifices for this cause are many: late supper, no lunch, detention, and the dreaded lectures from their superiors.

In the hands of these persons rests the future of the world. They will be our future police captains and undercover men. If you are wondering about whom I am writing, look into any average backyard in an average town in the United States, and you will see four or five children playing "cops and robbers."

WHY I LIKE TO LIVE ON A FARM

One of the greatest pleasures of living in the country is the freedom we enjoy. To exercise one's vocal chords without restraint in a city is prohibited because of the disturbance that it creates. Privacy is another freedom that country folk share.

We all love the large spaces and fresh air that is ours on a farm. Wide fields and pastures and spacious lawns are an example of this. Most every farm is located in such a place that a distant view of forests, fields, lakes, and mountains can be sightly inhaled.

Almost everything is appealing to the senses in one way or other. Can't you just hear the cheerful note of birds and the sound of wind whistling among the trees? Doesn't the very mention of fragrant apple blossoms, delightfully scented roses, and wild flowers bring those appetizing aromas to your nose. Best of all, can't you just taste those delicious red field strawberries?

Joy and happiness can be found in the simple recreation offered by everyday farm life. Horseback riding, picnics, hikes, and all sorts of seasoned events are sure to bring exhilarating fun.

Such phases of this life, such as bringing cows home from distant rocky pastures to be milked just as a glorious sunset, feeding a baby lamb or calf from a bottle while its tiny tail switches eagerly, and riding to the barn on top of a load of new mown hay at the close of day are those things that cause sentiment to be involved in loving life on a farm.
