The RIPPLE

1959

Dedication

We, the graduating class of 1959, in sincere appreciation for his personal guidance and wisdom during the past two years, respectfully dedicate this issue of

to

Mr. David Nichols

If College is Out of the Question

It is said by many educators that a good, well-rounded education is important in order to hold a good position in society.

"But I can't further my education because I haven't the ability," some individuals say. On the other hand, other individuals say, "I am not financially able to go further than high school." If you fit into one of these categories, do not jump to the conclusion that the doors of further knowledge and higher achievements are closed to you.

If you think you are handicapped, look around you at the prominent leaders in your community and see how many did not gain their education through college study. Think back and you will recall that one of our greatest presidents, Abraham Lincoln, was not a college-educated man. Both the community leaders and Abraham Lincoln reached their goals in life by applying themselves to the fullest extent of their capabilities.

If you have the earnest desire to reach some worthwhile objective, you can do it. It cannot be done, however, by sitting back and waiting for someone to instruct you. You are the teacher. What knowledge you acquire is solely up to you.

You, as the teacher, should divide your course of study into three major parts: book study, cultural study, and practical study.

The first division to consider is book study. Students in college have well-directed courses, whereas you will have to map and direct your own course of study. They will be given book lists and be required to read good literature. You will have to seek good books and require yourself to read them.

The second division to consider is cultural study. College students will express themselves in speeches and in written work of various types; you will have to make it a rule to write your thoughts and ideas in speeches, letters, and possibly in daily accounts. They will have instructors to guide them in culture. You will have to select, to a certain degree, your cultural entertainment. Make yourself familiar with various plays, works of art, and outstanding music so that you will be able to discuss intelligently these things.

The last major part to consider is practical study. This is where you will have the advantage over some college students. Why? You will be able to gain practical knowledge while you are earning money. They are spending theirs for education, and, therefore, many college students forfeit that four years of practical experience.

Practical study should include the study of your job and the business of which it is a part. You should also join a service organization for the betterment of the community. You should take an active part in the local government, either by supporting it or running for an office. All of these things will help you to acquire practical knowledge.

In order to make these three courses of study—book, cultural, and practical—worthwhile, you will have to set up your own requirements and make yourself meet them, but in doing so, do not make your goal easy to reach.

You can, I am sure, with patience and perseverance, reach the goal in life that you have planned by applying your best talents and efforts to full measure.

Literature

For the literary section of this year's Ripple, the students in Mr. Lewis's English classes were given a basic plot to develop as they chose. The four best resulting themes are published, as examples of a variety of techniques in composition.

Success Is Not Everything

Jefferson C. Philbrick was a young, struggling television playwright. He had been writing for several years without too much success, making just enough on which to exist. He was also a very lonely man. But he was a shy person, not at all the type to make acquaintances with members of the opposite sex. Finally through a Lonely Hearts Club he obtained the fictitious name of a girl who was also lonely and wanted companionship. Jefferson, using a fictitious name and a general post office delivery, started corresponding with her.

The two wrote to each other for several months; after a while the letters tended to be romantic. Jefferson, busy with his writing, found enough companionship in the letters and didn't bother trying to learn the identity of the girl to whom he was writing. He thought that she might be disappointed if she got to know him. But as the world turns, he finally fell in love with another girl.

Jefferson became acquainted with a waitress in a small restaurant. After a courtship of several months, they were married. During their courtship, Jefferson stopped corresponding to the Lonely Hearts' Girl.

Theirs was a happy marriage for about a year. They both seemed to have basically the same simple tastes. Between the two of them, they scraped up enough on which to live. About a year after the marriage one of Jefferson's stories was a big success on a top television dramatic show. From this starting point, Jefferson steadily climbed to the top as one of the best television playwrights.

As much as Jefferson liked the fame of being a successful writer and the benefits which it reaped, he remained basically the same simple person. His wife on the other hand became exactly the opposite. She craved the bright lights and activities that went with being the wife of a successful writer. At first Jefferson attended these parties, but as a result his writing suffered and his marriage grew weaker. As their marriage grew steadily weaker and Jefferson became increasingly unhappy, he asked for a divorce. His wife refused to grant him one. This made him angry, and for the first time since his marriage he remembered the Lonely Hearts' girl. He thought of how nice it would be to correspond with her again. He decided then that there was only one thing left to do.

A couple of weeks later Jefferson C. Philbrick, eminent television dramatist, and his wife were involved in an automobile accident which completely demolished their car. He, remarkably, escaped with only minor cuts and bruises, but she was tragically killed.

This accident made Jefferson a free man, supposedly. While going through his wife's belongings after the accident, Jefferson came across some old letters which turned out to be the ones he had written to the Lonely Hearts' girl. Suddenly Jefferson realized what had happened. At this moment a knock was heard at the door, and a commanding voice knifed through the stillness of the room. "Open up in the name of the law."

Gina

A dark, heavy man sat alone in a tavern somewhere in Mexico. His black hair was mussed and shining with sweat, and he was reading an old, soiled letter.

"'Gina'. She always signed her name that way. Not 'Love, Gina' or 'Yours, Gina,' just 'Gina'." The man was speaking to himself as though he were explaining the letter in detail to a child.

"She never signed her true name and I never signed mine. It is strange that I should share my every thought with a person I do not even know. I wonder if she would remember the letters? It has been so long." Suddenly a cloud of anger crossed his mind. "Ah, I should never have stopped writing to her when I married. But I must at least try. She was always so understanding in her letters."

"Francisco, Francisco!" Hearing his name, a small wiry waiter turned from the bar and walked quickly to the table.

"Francisco, a piece of paper and a pen for me, please. I have a letter to write", Pablo pleaded.

"You should see her, Pablo."

"No, Francisco, it would not do my pride good to go to her. No, please, the paper." Francisco returned to the bar and reached up to get a pen from a shelf. As he did, a glass fell and struck him on the head.

"There Pablo, do you see the trouble that you bring into my life? Now please do as I ask."

"Do not fear for my happiness," Pablo chuckled. "I will leave you to your peace as soon as I finish." Concentration replaced the joy and he began.

"Dear Gina, It has been many years since I have written you. It may be that you do not remember me. Many things have happened. I married and it was bad. In your letters you were always so understanding. I would so much like to meet you. Please give me your answer soon." Pablo's face clouded and then cleared. "I will sign it Dino as I always did." He then forced the letter into the envelope that Francisco had given him and left the tavern.

For many weeks afterward Pablo haunted the post office. Each day he would ask, "Is there no letter for me today?" And each day the postman would say, "No, Pablo, are you expecting a rich uncle to die?" Pablo would leave disappointed.

It was raining. The kind of rain that comes and goes and leaves one with a dreadful feeling of melancholy. But Pablo went to the post office, for he possessed a strong faith in human beings. He was loved and trusted by many because of this faith.

"Is there no letter for me today?"

"No . . . Well, there is a letter for Dino and it is your address."

"It is mine and many thanks to you, my friend," he said happily. He tore the letter open and read it with trembling hands.

"Dear Dino, It has been a long time. When I received your letter I did not know who this Dino was. Please do come to see me. Come to the address on the letter."

He read the letter many times and started to Gina's address. The rain had passed, and the streets were shining with their new cleanliness.

When he reached the right door, he knocked lightly, almost afraid of disturbing the person inside.

"Be patient, I am coming," a voice said. The door flew open and a small woman stood in the doorway. Pablo's mouth opened and shock danced on the ends of his nerves.

"You cannot be Gina," he said. The woman stood in silence and spoke with amazement.

"You are Dino?"

"Yes."

"Pablo, come in and sit." Pablo slowly followed her in.

"It was a small thing that made us quarrel, Pablo," she said when they were in the room.

"Yes, it was, and my pride would not allow me to return to you. But now you shall come home with me and we will be happy once more, Gina."

His wife smiled up at him and said, "We will be happy once more, Dino."

Lost Love

Dearest X³

Please forgive me for the condition this letter is in. I am writing you from an air raid shelter. The Germans are bombing us again today.

As I write you, I am sad in one way and happy in another. I am sad because this will have to be my last letter. These past two years by writing to you I have had an outlet for my emotions. Even though I have never seen you, I know from your own description what you look like. We have been the best of friends, but, alas, our letters to each other must cease. The reason is this: a couple of months ago I met a woman whom I liked very much. We fell in love and were married. This will come as a surprise to you because it is the first time I have mentioned anything about my social life. Please don't write to me again because I will not answer you. You may have thought I was in love with you. I am a little bit. Please forgive me.

Au revoir,
Y³

"Who are you writing to, Ammond?" asked Clethia, his wife, out of the semi-darkness of the shelter.

"Just the insurance company, dear," he replied, knowing that it was a lie.

The months flew by. Ammond and Clethia grew irritable toward each other and had frequent violent fights, arguments and quarrels. One night after a quarrel, Clethia told Ammond that she was going to leave him. Ammond was so upset that he stormed out of the house in a blind rage. He returned and found Clethia gone.

He began to drink and fell into a depression. One dreary evening while he was sitting in the kitchen of his apartment, he suddenly felt sick and passed out.

His eyes opened slowly. He saw that he was in a small room with a few pieces of furniture. An elderly doctor came through the door and explained where he was and how he got there. He had almost been asphyxiated. He had turned on the stove burner, either on purpose or by accident. He could not remember.

A few days later he was back in his own apartment. I must talk to someone, he thought. Who? I wonder if X³ would write me again. He took pen in hand, wrote a lengthy letter, mailed it, and waited for an answer. Three days passed, then four, and on the fifth day a letter came. He tore off the envelope and read the contents. The letters continued to come. His only purpose in life now was to look forward to the letters. He occasionally thought of his wife, but he was gradually falling in love with X³. It's funny, he thought, how much they looked alike.

One Friday afternoon as he was walking up the stairs to his apartment, he thought he heard the faint drone of high flying aircraft. He stood stock still, waiting for the expected wail of sirens. No sound came. Barooooooooooooommmmm! The building swayed and creaked. Plaster sifted from the ceiling and cracks appeared in the walls. The movement of the building jerked Ammond off his feet. He quickly sized up the situation, ran up the swaying stairs and burst through the shattered door. Through the window he glimpsed, to his horror, smoke—black thick smoke. He staggered quite dazed across the littered floor to the window and peered out of the gaping hole made by the blast. The scene confronting him was one of destruction.

The whine of a blockbuster shook him from his shock. He looked up and saw the bomb looming closer and in an instant his whole life flashed before him. A minute later and he was huddled in a corner, unconscious and in a state of shock.

He awoke in darkness. It was night and intensely hot. Fire curled around him. He was in agony for a few seconds then he slipped back into the blissful state of unconsciousness.

Later, twenty-nine days to be exact, he returned to the shambles that was once his home. He had received from the bomb blast second degree burns and wounds from shrapnel. He rummaged, limping on his sore leg, through the ashes and twisted girders. He searched in vain. Dejected and sad, he started to leave. His eyes found an old, blackened metal box. Opening the lid, he unfolded some singed letters. As he read them, his face changed into one of joy and happiness. The letters were from Y³ himself, to X³. "Clethia must be X³," he thought. He scribbled a note and all it said was:

Come home X³!
Love,
Ammond

What A Life!

Don Jacobs was completely happy with his bachelor life, and he was determined to stay that way.

He was a good looking man in his thirties, excellent in health and physical fitness. He would be a swell "catch" for any woman.

One morning while lingering over his late morning cup of coffee, he glanced at the "lonely hearts" column in the local newspaper. There it was! "Don Jacobs, age thirty-two, eligible, terribly lonely, will think of marriage" and on it went, practically his life story for the public to read.

"Of all the tricks!" he yelled, "Wait until I see Jack."

Jack was his best friend, and they had been through the war and everything else together. Practical joking was a common practice between them but this was going too far.

He stormed to Jack's apartment, but he was no help to him, and feeling disgusted, he returned to his own residence.

Several days later he received lots of mail. He read the letters out of curiosity and was amazed at the contents of a number of them. One woman, for example, asked him to marry her at once, and others longed to visit with him. One letter, however, was very interesting, and he wondered if he should write (under an assumed name of course) a friendly letter in reply to her most enjoyable letter.

He decided to, and within a year they grew to know each other very well through their correspondence. Her name was Jill Stevens, age thirty, unmarried, and very nice. He found himself hoping to get a letter from her often.

One evening Don decided to spend the night with Jack, since they hadn't seen each other since the newspaper incident.

Don was always welcome and didn't think anything of walking in and shouting, "Jack, old buddy, are you home?"

While he was standing in the room waiting for a reply, a cute, dark haired woman came in and stopped suddenly.

"Excuse me!" she exclaimed. "Doesn't Jack Johnson live here?"

"Yes, he does," smiled Don. "Lucky guy."

"What do you mean lucky guy?" she asked, "Where is he?"

"I was beginning to wonder the same," he answered, ignoring her first question.

So that's how they met. Joan was Jack's cousin, and she had stopped to say hello on her way home from her vacation.

Instead of waiting for Jack, Don escorted Joan to meet her bus. He was spellbound by her beauty and personality.

He forgot his correspondence within a year, for he and Joan were to be married as soon as he could get time off from his office work.

He got his vacation and he and Joan were married. They spent a glorious two weeks honeymooning at a resort.

The first year of marriage was happy, without a care in the world. Soon, however, the glamour dwindled. The firm for which Don was working wasn't prosperous, and they found that they must borrow money from her parents to pay the mortgage on their house.

They disagreed on many things and they became unhappy. They both agreed on a separate vacation, and she went home to her parents.

In Don's unhappiness he returned to his correspondence with Jill. She seemed to enjoy his letters, and he found much pleasure and happiness in hers. She seemed unhappy for a reason Don didn't know. He was concerned about this and decided that it would be nice to meet the woman whose letters had brought him such enjoyment.

They wrote and agreed on the time and place to meet.

When the time came for Jill's arrival, Don sat restlessly waiting at the restaurant.

To his surprise Joan walked in and was equally surprised when she saw him.

"Were you going home?" he asked, breaking the ice.

"To be perfectly honest with you," she admitted smiling, "I am looking for a friend of mine who was to meet me here."

"So was I, her name is Jill Stevens, do you know her?" he asked sheepishly.

"W-w-why yes, you don't know Don Adams do you?" she stammered.

With that they stared at each other in amazement.

"So I've been writing to the most wonderful person in the world!" they both said at once.

"And to think I almost lost him," she said, tears stinging her eyes.

"Come on," he soothed. "Let's go home."
